

WHEN WORK WORKS

A Perspective On Our Future Workplace and Workers

The workplace of today is changing before our very eyes. When work works is a strategic look at the workplace of tomorrow and the demands of individuals in the work environment. Some of the areas covered include:

- The knowledge, skills and abilities that companies will require in order to provide the services and products for their customers
- The new demands workers will have on ensuring that they maintain a work/life balance
- The driving forces behind these changes, i.e. technology, multiculturalism, multinational workforce, and social economic conditions now that will impact the future
- The global economy and its impact on the changing workplace

This interactive presentation provides a glimpse into the future workforce, trends and the resulting impact that will drive change as we close this decade and transition to the next. Workplace flexibility will not just be a word, but a demand by workers of what they expect from employers. Yet, employers will be raising the bar on what is expected of workers in the workforce, and how to gain that edge – without alienating employees. How these colliding expectations will be resolved will be an issue that will be discussed and analyzed to ensure corporate strategies incorporate policies and practices that companies and workers can use to remain in harmony with each other.

What attendees can expect to obtain from this presentation is:

- Enhanced knowledge on current issues and perceptions on future workplace issues through collective interaction
- How to work across generational, multiculturalism, multinational and gender based issues
- How to focus on developing intrinsic habits that make for a successful workplace, based on individual intellectual capital
- Anticipated barriers to workplace flexibility and how to overcome them

Finally concluding with an understanding of why employee well-being matters to the future of companies, if they are going to compete in the marketplace of the future.
